

The power of the herd

powerful lessons of leadership through understanding social intelligence

Psychologist Nicholas Humphrey believes that it is social intelligence, rather than quantitative intelligence that defines humans. So what is social intelligence? It is our ability to navigate complex social relationships and environments and most importantly to manage social change.

Would you agree that we find ourselves in times of unprecedented social change, more demographic complexity than we are used to and in more need of agile leaders than ever before? Our individual social attitudes and beliefs are often what drive our relationships in the workplace as well as our ability to collaborate effectively with both our internal and external networks. Effective leadership today is about being socially intelligent, which is born out of emotional intelligence.

Horses' evolutionary survival in the wild has depended on their social intelligence and most importantly their ability to 'work as a herd' because a horse cannot survive alone. This inspirational keynote draws on Saffron's own relationship with one of her horses, which acts as a metaphor for the lessons in leadership and social intelligence that she has learned from this partnership.

If your organization, department or team need an moving reminder of how to work more successfully together to achieve results then this is the presentation for you.
